With the Death of Duncan Marik, the League entered a state of Parliamentary gridlock. No one remaining state was powerful enough to conquer the other militarily, and no state was able to amass the political power necessary to achieve a majority in the Parliament.

As a result, there were now three ruler styling themselves as "Captain-General of the Free Worlds League." Years of low level conflict would follow the end of the schism, as the powers fought over worlds that had chosen to not align themselves.

The Periphery also found itself in a state of siege, as Pirate Attacks increased. Several smaller bands of mercenaries found that the opportunites to make money were very good, but remaining alive long enough to collect them would be a challenge.

The Schism had indeed shattered the League, and the states would spend the next two decades rebuilding, reorganizing, and planning.
